Examining the Role of a Thesis Statement

The thesis statement is the heart of every paper. It is a focused statement that summarizes the main argument and broadcasts the order in which the ideas will be discussed. Thesis statements have three parts: the topic, the claim, and the major points. The claim is your argument, opinion, or stance that will be supported by your evidence and examples. You present the evidence in the list of major points. Examine the thesis statements below.

Stress in the fast-food workplace has led to serious physical, psychological, and emotional problems for employees.

The Japanese automobile industry has been invigorated by foreign competition, which has forced it to create more economical production techniques and creative, targeted branding for its cars.

The thrill of pursuing happiness, the experiences along the way, and the knowledge that comes from trial and errors provide people with more pleasure and satisfaction than mere attainment of desires, despite the common perception that attainment is the final goal; however, attaining desires does provide some happiness.

Topic: Work place stress for fast-food workers
Claim: Stress causes problems
Points: The paper will examine three areas: physical, psychological and emotional (to support the claim).

Topic: The relationship between the Japanese car industry and the foreign car industry
Claim: The outside car industry caused the Japanese industry to change.
Points: The paper will examine two areas: first production techniques and second branding (to support the claim).

Topic: What causes happiness
Claim: The process of achieving your desire gives more happiness than only having dreams/goals.
Points: The paper will examine three topics: the thrill of pursuing, the experiences along the way, and wisdom gained from trial and error.
The working thesis statement is the seed from which your argument grows as you plan your essay. It is the working draft of the thesis that will appear in your final paper. It allows you, the writer, to go through the process of focusing, brainstorming, and ordering information as you work toward a statement that will not only convey to the audience the theme of the essay but also allow you to organize your thoughts and predict body paragraphs.

The working thesis will vary depending on the subject and the type of writing in which you are engaged: the thesis for a business report is quite different from a thesis for a personal essay. However, the thesis for both of these types of essay will ultimately provide a road map of the paper and help the writer decide how and what to write. It establishes, and even helps you develop, the claim(s) the essay will support.

As the paper evolves through the drafting stage, the thesis will also evolve, but the working thesis you develop using the process outlined in this handout will help you to build a strong thesis even before you draft.

Developing a Working Thesis Statement

Developing a solid thesis statement takes time. It begins with reading and responding to a prompt or assignment to develop a basic claim, brainstorming the supporting arguments for that claim, creating a solid argumentative framework for the paper, and even predicting how you will conclude the essay.

Sample Prompt

Many societies believe that the pursuit of happiness is a fundamental human right, but it is also true that attainment of happiness remains elusive. Perhaps Bertrand Russell had it right when he said, "To be without some of the things you want is an indispensable part of happiness." What gives us more pleasure and satisfaction: the pursuit of our desires or the attainment of them?

Write a personal essay in which you draw on your own experience, observation, and reading to discuss your answer to the question posed by the prompt. An effective essay will construct an argument that accounts for the complexity of the opening truth statement even as it weighs specific examples of pursuit and attainment to arrive at its conclusion.

Reading and Responding to a Prompt or Assignment to Develop a Basic Claim

A thesis is the central claim of your paper—the one statement that all other ideas and information in the essay aims to prove, so in its most basic form, the thesis statement must make a claim.
First, carefully read and analyze the prompt. As you read the prompt, you should look for key words and phrases that identify the ideas you are asked to address, that define the type of essay you are to produce, and that spell out the kinds of information that will count as evidence.

Working Thesis Statement, First Draft

The pursuit of one's desires provides people with more pleasure and satisfaction than the attainment of them.

This first draft makes a basic claim that directly answers the question posed by the prompt—a claim that can be developed by examining readings, observation, and personal experience. However, it does not suggest the kinds of evidence or the type of development that the paper will present, so there is more work to be done.

Brainstorming the Supporting Arguments to Refine Your Claim

Again, review the prompt and check for specific requirements for the essay. Remember that all information and ideas should relate directly to the essay topic. If the prompt lists subtopics to include, consider using them for your body paragraphs. If the prompt does not specify the subtopics, you will need to generate a list of main supporting ideas. In either case, you should incorporate in your thesis the terms that you will use in your paper.

Working Thesis Statement, Second Draft

The thrill of pursuing happiness, the experiences along the way, and the knowledge that comes from trial and error provide people with more pleasure and satisfaction than the mere attainment of desires.

This draft now has several subtopics incorporated in it. This paper will use the thrill of pursuing happiness, the experiences from the pursuit, and the knowledge from those experiences as separate topics to support the main assertion.

Creating a Solid Argumentative Framework for Your Paper

After you have a detailed thesis and supporting points, decide upon how you will argue these claims. Remember that you must present your points in a way that removes the preconceptions your audience may have. Consider the opposite side of whatever argument you will make; unless your paper presents a summary of research of a topic, you must clearly state your point-of-view. Be prepared to support your claims with details and facts.
Working Thesis Statement, Third Draft

The thrill of pursuing happiness, the experiences along the way, and the knowledge that comes from trial and error provide people with more pleasure and satisfaction than the mere attainment of desires, despite the common perception that attainment is the final goal.

By using subtopics and the main assertion, this paper will argue that the common perception is incorrect. To prove this point, it will use the body paragraphs to argue each of the supporting claims. In each of these paragraphs, one of the subtopics will be presented in a way that supports the claim that there is more to life than achieving goals.

Predicting How You Will Conclude Your Paper

Your thesis statement defines the central argument of your paper; your conclusion draws on the discussion and evidence in the body to support that argument. You may, for instance, conclude by re-emphasizing the points you made in your paper or by giving your audience a call to action. Your concluding strategy will depend on your audience, purpose, and the type of paper you are writing.

Working Thesis Statement, Fourth Draft

The thrill of pursuing happiness, the experiences along the way, and the knowledge that comes from trial and error provide people with more pleasure and satisfaction than the mere attainment of desires, despite the common perception that attainment is the final goal; however, attaining desires does provide some happiness.

This essay will most likely conclude by offering a compromise with the audience. Instead of claiming that pursuing desires is the only source of happiness, the paper will admit that attaining desires does bring some happiness, just not as much as pursuing desires.

Activity

Follow the steps above to construct a working thesis statement for the following prompt.

Describe in an essay the most important person in your life. Explain how he or she became that person and what he or she has done to remain the most important person in your life. Use first-hand experience and events to demonstrate the relevance of this person and his or her continuing impact on your life.

Answer Key for Activity

Possible working thesis statement:
The most important person in my life is my father because he has been my idol my entire life; has never made me doubt his strength, discipline, or courage; and has always done what is best for me and my family.
