Prepositions of Direction

Prepositions of direction indicate the location of a noun (a person, place, or thing) in relation to another noun. Prepositions precede a noun or a pronoun and often accompany verbs of motion. This handout covers the prepositions to, toward, on, and in when they are used to express movement, direction, or purpose.

To can express movement in the direction of a physical place.
- I walked to the Writing Center from my car.
- Tim ran to school because he was late.

To can also express purpose when attached to a verb as an infinitive.
- They stayed after school to complete the assignment.
- I exercise to stay in shape.

Toward, like to, suggests movement. However, toward indicates movement in the direction of a general area rather than a specific destination. Toward implies that the destination may not have been reached.
- John traveled to San Francisco. (This means John physically arrived at San Francisco.)
- John traveled toward San Francisco. (This means John may have passed San Francisco or stopped before he arrived there.)

Other prepositions of direction are created by adding to to the prepositions of location on or in.

Onto (On + To) is used to express movement toward the outside of an object.
- The cat jumped onto the table.
- The leaf fell onto the sidewalk.

Into (In + To) indicates movement toward the inside of an object, space, or volume.
- Mary jumped into the water.
- Paul got into the shower.

In many cases, on or in can be used without to. Adding to to the preposition implies action, whereas on or in by themselves imply position.
- Suzy is on the bed. (This sentence simply relates Suzy’s position.)
- Suzy jumped onto the bed. (This tells us not only that Suzy is on the bed, but also relates the action she took to get there.)
