ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Like the American home front during WWII, this project was a collaborative effort that would not have been a success without the support and contributions of many people. First, I would like to express my deepest gratitude to the Cultural Resources staff at Rosie the Riveter/WWII Home Front National Historical Park, especially Isabel Ziegler, Ann Roos, Virginia Bones, and Paul Scolari, for their unwavering support, assistance, ideas, and training. They gave me a wide berth to create these exhibits and tell the story I wanted to tell, and the knowledge they have imparted on me will serve me well in my future endeavors. The work they do for the National Park Service in preserving our shared cultural history is invaluable, I cannot express how grateful I am to them for trusting me with this project.

Thank you to Dr. Charlotte Sunseri for supporting this project from start to finish. Her enthusiasm, encouragement, thoughtful direction, and wealth of knowledge gave me the strength and ability to carry on when I was discouraged. Working with her throughout my graduate career has been a gift, I could not have done it without her. Thank you to Dr. Roberto González for also being an enthusiastic supporter of this project and providing important resources and feedback on this project and report.

I would also like to thank the Anthropology Department at San José State University for offering such an exciting, challenging, and holistic graduate program. My experience here has been nothing short of amazing. I have gained knowledge, confidence, and a sense of accomplishment, and feel prepared to enter the professional market as a well-trained historical archaeologist.

Thank you to the late Mr. Ed Von der Porten, without whose collection this project would not have been possible. His knowledge, passion, and appreciation for history and material culture resulted in an incredible collection of artifacts that will remain an important part of the WWII American Home Front legacy. I am grateful to have had opportunity to work with him on this project.

And lastly, I would be remiss if I did not acknowledge the American people of the WWII home front, especially the women and children, who fought the war from their homes, their kitchens, and their playrooms. Thank you, your contributions remain an indelible part of our collective history, and I will forever hold you dear.

ABSTRACT

World War II (WWII) was a time of significant cultural upheaval in the United States. America's participation in the war produced substantial changes to gender roles, consumer behavior, advertising, labor, children's activities, and entertainment, and saw a significant swell in expressions of nationalism and patriotism. By examining the ways in which patriotism was reproduced in the American domestic sphere through material culture from the era, with particular attention paid to women and children, this project contributes to the cultural understanding of domestic life on the American home front during WWII. While there is significant literature on WWII propaganda campaigns, few scholars have addressed the ways in which those campaigns were visible in the domestic sphere. This project seeks to fill those gaps in anthropological and historical knowledge by presenting a visual cultural storybook of how propaganda manifested as patriotism at home via two related digital museum exhibits in partnership with the National Park Service.

1. INTRODUCTION

Project Overview

World War II (WWII) was a time of significant cultural upheaval and change in the United States. America's participation in the war produced substantial transformations to gender roles, consumer behavior, advertising, labor, children's activities, and entertainment. There is a considerable volume of literature concerning WWII in the disciplines of anthropology, history, psychology, political science, and journalism, among others, covering everything from propaganda—including the role of anthropologists in designing government propaganda campaigns—to attitudes, behavior, gender roles, children, and cultural values (Anderson 1981; Collins 2003; Hart 1992; Hartmann 1984; Honey 1985; McEuen 2011; Ossian 2011; Price 2008; Rupp 2015; Tuttle 1995; Wright 2015; Yellin 2005). Additionally, in the past few decades, material culture analysis has emerged as a discipline in its own right, drawing from the disciplines of art history, anthropology, and archaeology to become a respected field of inquiry into human consumption practices and material expression of cultural values (Arnould and Thompson 2005; Glassie 1999; Hodder 1991, 1994; Miller 1991, 2009; Prown 1982; Quimby 1978; Sofaer 2009; Tilley et al. 2006). This project seeks to contribute to the cultural narrative and understanding of American domestic life during WWII by analyzing a collection of WWII-era cultural artifacts that includes children's games, toys, and puzzles; models and model kits; books and pamphlets; household and decorative items, and other various objects to explore the ways in which nationalism and patriotism were reproduced in the American domestic sphere, especially by women and children (for studies on patriotism and material culture, see Baker 2011; Blankenship 2014; Brown 2013; Wood 2014). The primary focus of this study is how children's toys and everyday domestic items reflected the war and became a method of delivery for government propaganda and expressions of patriotism.

During this era, cultural ideals about femininity, gender roles, and domestic practices were very specific and reflected the traditional, patriarchal values of the time. A woman's proper place was in the home as housewife, cook, and mother, and propaganda campaigns artfully fostered temporary changes in behavior while simultaneously reinforcing cultural norms (Anderson 1981; Collins 2003; Kimble 2011; Honey 1985; McEuen 2011; McFeely 1994; Rupp 2015; Ryan 2012; Snyder 1997; Willey 2015; Yang 2005). Women could join the war effort and fulfill their patriotic duty by enlisting in the military or going to work in factories—roles traditionally reserved for men—and return to their proper place in the domestic sphere when the war was over (Anderson 1981; Campbell 1984; Collins 2003; Hartmann 1984; Honey 1985; Kimble 2011; McEuen 2011, 2016; McFeely 1994; Rupp 2015; Ryan 2012; Snyder 1997; Wells 2005; Willey 2015; Yellin 2005; Yesil 2004). The material culture in this study reflects the cultural values of patriotism, femininity and domesticity, and national service that emerged and dominated the U.S. from 1941-1945.

This project was cultivated from the Ed and Saryl Von der Porten Collection, a collection of 1,887 WWII-era cultural artifacts from which an assemblage was curated for two separate but related digital exhibits on Google Arts and Culture in partnership with the National Park Service (NPS). The collection is property of Rosie the Riveter/WWII Home Front National Historical Park in Richmond, CA, which is operated by the NPS. The collection, known simply as the Von der Porten or VdP Collection, was acquired from private collectors, Ed and Saryl Von der Porten, through funding from the Rosie the Riveter Trust, the non-profit partnership organization that supports the NPS in preserving and maintaining the historic and cultural heritage of the Rosie the Riveter Park and the WWII American Home Front. The exhibits feature artifacts from select categories from the collection, one focusing on children's toys, games, and books, the other on household and decorative objects, books, personal adornment, and other items found in the home. Each object was carefully selected, and exhibit labels feature pertinent historical and cultural context, some of which were informed by oral histories. The exhibits were promoted on the Rosie the Riveter Facebook page, and in May 2018 I selected a few of the objects for display in one of the exhibit cases at the park, where they will remain until May 2019.

Project Significance

This project contributes to the cultural understanding of domestic life on the American home front during WWII, with particular attention paid to women, children, and their activities. The lives of American children in WWII have largely been overlooked (for exceptions, see Ossian 2011; Tuttle 1995; Wright 2015), with much of the focus on children during WWII centered on Japanese American children and internment (Blankenship 2014; Tong 2014), or European children (Childs and Wharton 1989; DeGraffenried 2014; Paksuniemi et al. 2015; Silver 2015). Furthermore, while both the experiences of American women (Anderson 1981; Campbell 1984; Collins 2003; Gowdy-Wygant 2013; Hartmann 1984; Hegarty 2010; Honey 1985; McEuen 2011, 2016; Willey 2015), and WWII propaganda campaigns (Cord 2014; Hart 1992; Jones 2009; Rupp 2015; Ryan 2012; Sitikoff 1994; Thomas 2011; Ward 1994; Wells 2005; Witkowski 1998; Yang 2005) have received considerable attention across disciplines, few have addressed the ways in which those campaigns were visible in the domestic sphere. This project seeks to fill the gaps in anthropological and historical knowledge by showcasing how WWII propaganda manifested at home in the form of material culture. WWII produced significant and lasting cultural changes in America, and this project aims to enrich the cultural and historical narrative of the WWII American home front for both the NPS and the discipline of anthropology by presenting a visual cultural narrative, informed by oral histories and historical research, within a framework of anthropological theory about material culture, children's play, gender roles, patriotism, propaganda, and the WWII American home front.

Partnering with the National Park Service

In February of 2017 I began an internship with the Cultural Resources Management Department of the National Park Service (NPS) at their four jointly managed sites located in Contra Costa County, CA: John Muir National Historic Site (JOMU), Eugene O'Neill National Historic Site (EUON), Port Chicago Naval Magazine National Memorial (POCH), and Rosie the Riveter/WWII Home Front National Historical Park (RORI). I obtained this internship by contacting Supervisory Museum Curator Isabel Ziegler and Museum Curator Ann Roos and inquiring about an internship opportunity. My internship was secured through the NPS partner organization, The Student Conservation Association (SCA), which is a program that assists students in finding professional internships with the NPS. I worked two eight-hour shifts per week from February to May, splitting my time evenly between JOMU and RORI, with occasional shifts at EUON, assisting the Cultural Resources staff with collection management duties and exhibit installations. Using the Von der Porten Collection for my project was suggested early on by Isabel Ziegler, as an exhibit would be an appropriate deliverable for my academic requirements and would also benefit the NPS by utilizing a significant resource in their museum collection. From August 2017 through June 2018 I worked independently and with staff of RORI to develop the deliverable for this project. This project report will describe the anthropological literature and data which inform my interpretations of the Von der Porten Collection, as well as critically analyze the outcomes of the project.

2. PROPAGANDA, PATRIOTISM, AND CULTURAL IDEALS ON THE AMERICAN HOME FRONT

The attack on Pearl Harbor on December 7, 1941 catapulted the United States into WWII. In an instant, every American was expected to participate in the war effort, whether they wanted to or not. To mobilize support for the war and elicit desired behaviors from Americans, the U.S. government employed extensive propaganda campaigns using posters, radio, film, theater, books, and magazine advertising. The results of those campaigns are visible in the material culture of the era and enable archaeologists to interpret the country's social relations and cultural values. Historical archaeology and material culture studies offer opportunities to link otherwise inanimate objects to animate human experiences, creating meaningful narratives that enrich our knowledge and understanding of the past. During WWII, American material culture became saturated with themes of war, much of it influenced by government propaganda. Participation in the war effort was expected of all Americans, and engagement with material culture that reflected both the accepted and expected cultural values of that time was a visible way for people to signal their support. By displaying and using objects that reflected the war, such as ration books, war bond certificates, books, cooking and canning guides, patriotic household and decorative items, personal adornment, and toys, women and children not actively participating in the war effort as industrial workers and military service members could assert their participation and their place in America's collective identity as enthusiastic patriots.

The Materiality of Propaganda and Consumerism

There is significant literature on WWII propaganda, with many studies focusing on the labor campaigns directed at women (Anderson 1981; Campbell 1984; Hartmann 1984; Honey 1985; Jones 2009; Yesil 2004), and on the campaigns encouraging rationing, and consumer thrift and responsibility (Jones 2009; McFeely 1994; Rupp 2015; Ryan 2012; Sitikoff 1994; Ward 1994; Wells 2005; Witkowski 1998, 2003; Yang 2005). Propaganda campaigns used carefully selected images and language to shape behavior; for example, “victory” was a popular theme and is visible in a wide range of campaigns and material culture: women were urged to plant Victory Gardens, preserve food for victory, and knit for victory, children’s toys and games were victory-themed, and household items such as tablecloths, stationery and ink, and playing cards were re-branded with victory themes to foster patriotism and cooperation in the war effort (Adkins et al. 1994).

Government-issued propaganda was distributed by the Office of War Information (OWI), a government agency created by President Roosevelt in 1942 (Peters and Wooley n.d.). The OWI created a variety of propaganda campaigns to influence civilians, including radio, newsreels, and magazine advertising, but the most prominent and successful campaigns, arguably, were posters. Posters were inexpensive, and easy to create and widely distribute. Thomas (2011) asserts that the poster campaigns of WWII are one of its most remarkable cultural legacies. Their success, he contends, was in part because they effectively appealed to positive emotions associated with victory, honor, and patriotism. In addition to posters, visual propaganda in magazines and magazine advertising were also a prominent and successful medium. Magazines like Life, Ladies’ Home Journal, and Saturday Evening Post cheerfully promoted the government narrative about the war, encouraging participation in rationing programs by marketing sacrifice as a noble, yet temporary, patriotic duty. An example of this is shown by Kimble (2011) in his examination and critique of the Ladies’ Home Journal Women in National Service (WINS) campaign. He asserts that it artfully exploited the culturally accepted, and expected, role of women as submissive homemakers to inspire and transform them into “a virtual homefront army” (2011, 86). Jones (2009) explores the role of magazine advertising during WWII, arguing that corporate and government advertisements, especially in regard to food rationing and product shortages, were more akin to public relations than to selling consumer products: the product they were all “selling” was support for the war effort. Similarly, Hart (1992) analyzes the manner in which advertising copywriters adapted to the cultural changes brought on by the war to produce patriotic ads that were on track with the war effort. She asserts that advertisers were eager to be viewed as supportive of the war; therefore, they obliged by creating ads that encouraged both consumer loyalty and patriotic duty to the war both at home and abroad.

Sitikoff (1994) offers a glimpse into the ways American behaviors were influenced by the various propaganda campaigns during the war, and provides a commentary on how lasting cultural changes in the domestic and consumer sphere were produced as a result. His essay gives a general overview of life on the American home front during WWII, outlining the ways in which the national narrative of the war influenced every aspect of civilian life from consumerism to child-rearing. Similarly, Ward (1994) outlines the rationing campaigns designed to generate consumer frugality. She argues that consumers embraced rationing, likely because the Office of Price Administration (OPA) put policies in place that prevented the cost inflation normally associated with fluctuations in supply and demand. As a result, frugal consumers assisted in the repair of the previous decade’s Depression economy. In archaeology, identifying consumer patterns is primarily done through studying the material record. What is left behind for archaeologists to find reports on the household’s socio-economic status, cultural values, and daily practices, all of which are reflected in the choices they made as consumers. In an archaeological assemblage, frugality would be visible in the differences in types of ceramics. For example, Wall (1991) asserts that middle-class women on the higher end of the economic spectrum often used the same types of higher-end servingware in both the private and public domain, while poorer middle-class families had fewer pieces of high-quality china, which they would use when entertaining to signal their class affiliation, yet in their daily private use they utilized more durable lower-end ceramics. Similar to Victorian-era America where women signaled the cultural values of gentility and “true womanhood” (Fitts 1999; Wall 1991) through domestic practices and material goods, Americans, specifically women, were expected to signal their eager participation in the government’s war effort expectations.

Wartime Identities and Material Culture

As men were already the principal participants in professional, labor, and military service, propaganda campaigns primarily targeted women. Women, specifically middle-class white women, were encouraged to participate in the war effort by going to work in factories (Anderson 1981; Campbell 1984; Hartmann 1984; Honey 1985; Jones 2009; Yesil 2004), joining the armed forces as WAVES, WAACs, or SPARs (Kimble 2011; Ryan 2012; Willey 2015), and at home in the kitchen through rationing, food preservation, and Victory Gardens (Gowdy-Wygant 2013; McFeely 1994; Wells 2005; Yang 2005). Wells (2005) asserts that women were targeted by domestic propaganda campaigns that aimed to alleviate food shortages through Victory Gardens and food preservation practices like canning and jarring because they were primarily responsible for shopping and providing food for their families. Since the mid-19th century, with the birth of the Victorian “Cult of Domesticity,” or “Cult of True Womanhood,” women were viewed as the central figure in the home, in charge of preparing meals, taking care of their husbands and children, and being the moral guide of the household (Keister and Southgate 2012; Patton 1999; Rotman 2009; Wall 1994; Welter 1996). Women often signaled their fulfillment of this role through the choices they made as consumers that emphasized morality, health, and femininity.

Like Wells (2005), Witkowski (1994, 2003) and Yang (2005) evaluate and critique the propaganda campaigns that promoted food rationing and consumer frugality at home, all of which targeted women. Yang (2005) examines the food-rationing orders put forth by the Roosevelt administration in 1943, asserting that these campaigns helped create the “kitchen patriot” as a role model for women in the domestic sphere. The initiatives included rationing orders and nutritional education and awareness, and while they were for all Americans, by focusing on women the government was able to frame rationing as a noble patriotic duty rather than a government order (Yang 2005). These campaigns encouraged women to plant Victory Gardens, preserve and can food, adhere to rations, recycle materials, and return used cooking fats to the butcher so that they could be used for fuel.

The labor campaigns that urged women into the workforce were both aggressive and highly successful. Prior to involvement in the war, the U.S. had experienced over a decade of the Depression and its accompanying high unemployment and financial hardships. However, in December of 1941, seemingly overnight the war turned America’s unemployment crisis into a labor shortage, and middle-class women became the prime candidates for filling the spaces left vacant by the men heading off to fight (Hartmann 1984, 2). Women were needed in the factories, and the government campaigned heavily to enlist them. Honey (1984) examines the campaigns aimed at recruiting women into the workforce during WWII, focusing on two primary sources, Saturday Evening Post and True Story. She argues that during this time, certain socio-economic and political elements created the need for a new narrative about working women, which resulted in governmental agencies such as the Office of War Information (OWI) and War Advertising Council, as well as popular magazines like Saturday Evening Post and True Story producing propaganda that recast women as legitimate industrial workers. These campaigns encouraged women to do their duty and fight the war from the home front by taking jobs that traditionally were performed by men. Honey's (1984) examination also includes the distinctions made by these campaigns between working-class and middle-class women, asserting that class divisions brought forth varying expectations for women in and out of the workplace both during and after the war. In addition to the class distinctions in these campaigns it is important to note that there were racial distinctions as well. America was segregated during WWII, and black women—most of whom already worked outside the home for significantly less money than their white counterparts—were all but ignored by government recruitment campaigns (Soskin 2002).

While necessary for the war effort, middle-class women going to work and into military service presented a cultural problem about traditional gender roles that needed to be addressed. During this time, there were distinct divisions of labor by gender, with men taking the role of economic provider and women the role of domestic provider as wife, mother, and housekeeper (Anderson 1981; Campbell 1984; Collins 2003; Hartmann 1984; McEuen 2016; Snyder 1997; Walker 1998). Knaff (2012), McEuen (2011) and Willey (2015) all examine the various ways in which cultural ideals about femininity became more pronounced in order to counter the perceived “masculinization” of women caused by their new roles in industry and military service, asserting that women were expected to perform their traditional gender roles in ways that were highly visible in order to promote the ideal image of the white, middle-class, American housewife; a role that would be properly reclaimed once the war was over. Evidence of the hyper-feminization of women and assertion of traditional gender roles can be seen in Marcellus' (2005) examination of the way women in the workplace were portrayed in Bo's'n's Whistle, the in-house magazine for workers at the Kaiser shipyards in Richmond, CA. She contends that the magazine aimed to boost male morale in the workplace by depicting women as feminine and sexy and whose presence in the shipyards was only temporary; they would return to their proper place in the domestic sphere when the war was over.

Literature concerning children's toys and play, particularly in wartime, is also found in a variety of disciplines, with studies ranging from how children play (Csikszentmihalyi and Bennett 1971), how cultural values are reflected through toys and games (Best 1998; Higonnet 2007; Matthews 1995; Regan 1994; Varney 2002), and a wide range of arguments concerning war toys and playing at war (Andreas 1969; Carlson-Paige and Levin 1987; Smith 1994; Wegener-Spöhring, 1994). During WWII, images of war permeated virtually every aspect of children's lives, through toys, games, puzzles, comic books, cartoons, and movies (Cord 2014; Matthews 1995, 2006; Thomas 2011). Arguably, toys became a delivery for WWII propaganda in their own right. By playing with a toy that reflected the war effort, children participated in something that otherwise would have excluded them, thereby claiming a valid place in the country's collective identity as patriots. Regan (1994) asserts that while often a response to market fluctuation, war toys serve as a medium for delivering the patriotic symbols necessary to manipulate support for—and cultural acceptance of—war. By encouraging children to play at war by providing war toys, it ensures that the narrative of war remains prevalent in everyday activities. Similarly, Varney (2002) argues that by producing war toys in times of war, toy manufacturers can capitalize on the appeal of culturally relevant toys without the burden of its ugly realities: children can play war like their daddies—and always be the victorious hero—with no risk of loss of life or limb. In a time of rationing and consumer thrift, by producing toys and other war-themed “luxury” propaganda, toy manufacturers were able to profit from a war that otherwise stalled the economy.

Material Culture Theory

Material cultural remains are the bread and butter of archaeological interpretation. They are the primary resources we use to understand the past, and they allow us to paint vivid pictures of a culturally rich and diverse human experience. The things people leave behind give practitioners an unedited glimpse into their daily lives—what they ate, what they bought, how they decorated their homes, how they disposed of their trash—all of these daily, habitual practices provide insight into the ways in which people organized their personal space and asserted who they were (Deetz 1996; Hodder 1991; Little 1996). The material remains that historical archaeologists study can, at the very least, provide them with temporal, geographical, and stylistic markers from which to begin their analysis. In addition, material remains can reflect the user's socio-economic status, their access to commodity networks, and their ideologies, religious affiliations, and social interactions (De Cunzo 1987; Deetz 1996; Lightfoot 2015; Mullins 1999, 2011). Scholars have argued (Berger 2009; Deetz 1996; Glassie 1999; Hodder 1991, 1994, 2012; Miller 1991, 2009; Prown 1982; Quimby 1978; Sofaer 2009; Tilley et al. 2006) that material culture provides a method for those using it to express cultural ideologies, as well as express their own individual identity.

However, it is imperative that material culture is analyzed within the socio-cultural context in which it is used in order for it to be meaningful. So how do we accurately interpret the past and assign meaning to the “small things forgotten” (Deetz 1996)? It would be impossible for historical archaeologists to do the kind of work they do today without input from other bodies of scholarship, particularly cultural anthropology and history. History provides a template of sorts for practitioners to work from and add to, and a broader social context to understand lived experiences. Although much of history is written by and about the dominant cultural group, often omitting the experiences of those whose lives do not fit the desired narrative (Little 1996), historical archaeology remains intimately connected with history and its narratives, even as it challenges them (Hall and Silliman 2006). While the written record provides documentary evidence of time and place, it more accurately reflects the mindset of the person that wrote it and is often edited—sometimes intentionally, sometimes unintentionally—to reflect ideals rather than reality. To quote National Park Service Ranger Betty Reid Soskin, "What gets remembered is a function of who's in the room doing the remembering" ("Oldest National Park Ranger Shares 'What Gets Remembered'" 2014).

Consequently, the material remains left behind, supplemented by written records, provide us with a more accurate window into the past, one that is rich in diversity and meaning. Although practitioners agree that material culture is the primary source for understanding the past, they employ a variety of interpretive approaches. Hall and Silliman (2006) assert that focusing on processes of change rather than on patterns, worldviews, and eras allows for more complex questions and meaningful interpretations of individual and collective national identities through archaeology, while Deetz (1996) argues that looking at the things people left behind and the ways in which they used them allow us to interpret their individual and collective mindsets and gain insights into our national history. Like Deetz (1996), Singleton (1996) contends that material culture can provide us with meaningful insights about people's daily experiences, ideology, worldview, and socio-economic class, though Hall and Silliman caution against falling into the trap of "classification" (2006, 5), which they claim can sacrifice the attention to processes and the complex questions of identity that accompany such an inquiry. That being said, Hall and Silliman (2006) agree with Deetz (1996) that artifacts reflect a wealth of information about the people who used them; it is simply a matter of asking the right questions. And, to answer them, historical archaeologists have a duty to carefully synthesize often vastly different types of evidence in order to provide the most accurate and meaningful interpretations of the processes that shaped history. Artifacts tell stories about the people who used them: the foods they ate, the type of servingware from which they ate those foods, daily use and decorative items, and personal adornment all reflect how people asserted their identities through the choices they made as consumers. (Deetz 1996; Hodder 2012; Miller 1991; Spencer-Wood 1987). Consumer choice is a principal arena of inquiry for historical archaeologists because it enables us to understand how individuals fit in to society as a whole, and how they navigated their economic roles and social status through material culture.

The study of material culture provides context and meaning, and gives an object social agency (Gell 1998; Hodder 2012; Miller 2009; Sofaer 2009). During WWII, every American was expected to participate in home front efforts. People signaled their patriotism by displaying and using items that signified support for and engagement in the war, and the material culture in their homes reflected both their individual tastes and the United States' involvement in the global conflict, thereby granting agency to the objects they selected to communicate their national identity as patriotic Americans. For children, toys became tools of enculturation, reinforcing the concepts of nationalism, victory, and loyalty as important values. For women, books, beauty items, and household use and decorative objects simultaneously reinforced traditional notions of white, middle-class American womanhood (Anderson 1981; Campbell 1984; Collins 2003; McEuen 2016; Wall 1994; Welter 1996), and the role of women as domestic soldiers on the American home front.

Through material culture, historical archaeologists study change and its processes over time. Typically, those changes happen relatively slowly (Deetz 1996; Hall and Silliman 2006; Little 1996), and practitioners can track the evolution of the small shifts in culture that mark significant changes; however, major events—like war—can cause changes in a society to occur more quickly. Although the events that led to WWII did not happen overnight, the United States' participation in the conflict was, indeed, a sudden and unexpected event that brought significant changes to consumer culture, advertising, and gender roles, all of which are visible in the material record. While the government cultivated propaganda to urge support for the war effort from Americans, often with the help of anthropologists (Price 2008), they also emphasized the cultural values present in society at the time in order to ease the discomfort that many Americans felt as a result of the rapid changes taking place on the home front. Despite the radical shifts in gender roles caused by the war, the underlying narrative of a woman's proper place remained as it had in the years leading up to the war (Anderson 1981; McEuen 2011), and, as I demonstrate in Chapter 4, the material culture of the era reflects that narrative in nearly every category.

3. METHODS

I employed a broad range of qualitative and quantitative methods for this project to collect, manage and interpret my data. My datasets include anthropological and historical literature, artifact descriptions of the Von der Porten Collection inventoried in multiple Excel spreadsheets, selected exhibit items and artifact photographs, the Google Arts and Culture metadata spreadsheet, and oral histories. Due to the large volume of artifacts in the collection, spreadsheets were crucial for organization throughout the cataloging and exhibit preparation process. The spreadsheets allowed me to easily search through and organize my data by category, name, box number, and catalog record number. Oral histories selected from archival sources provided me with personal experiences and recollections from which I could see common themes and aid in the interpretation of the Von der Porten Collection and my exhibits.

The Von der Porten Collection

Prior to becoming NPS property, the collection was photographed and given individual item numbers by the Von der Portens. When I began working with the collection in February of 2017, the NPS had accessioned the collection and inventory verification had begun but not yet been completed. The collection remained in the original boxes in which the Von der Portens had housed it, 121 boxes of varying sizes plus some larger, stand-alone objects such as an American Flag and two toy rifles. The NPS provided me with a Standard Operating Procedure (SOP) document for completing the inventory process. Previous NPS interns had inventoried approximately fifty boxes using an Excel spreadsheet created by the NPS (Table 1) from the original inventory spreadsheet provided by the Von der Portens. Item numbers, description, and original sort (category) were all complete; my duties consisted of confirming or re-categorizing sort categories, assessing condition—excellent, good, fair, poor— assigning a VdP box number, and making notes as needed. Boxes were labeled with an assigned consecutive VdP box number, and the inventory numbers for the items it contained were written on the label. NPS box numbers were to be assigned later as items were cataloged in the NPS database and rehoused for archival museum storage.

Table 1. NPS Spreadsheet Data for Von der Porten Inventory

Item number w/o alpha	Item number w/ alpha	Description	Original Sort	FY 2015-2016 Sort	VdP box number	NPS Box Number	Condition	Rehousing Notes	Actions taken	Notes
-----------------------	----------------------	-------------	---------------	-------------------	----------------	----------------	-----------	-----------------	---------------	-------

There are sixteen original sort categories with a small percentage of items (<8%) that were sorted as “#N/A,” “TBD,” “miscellaneous,” or left blank. During the inventory process I adjusted original category descriptions in the FY 2015-2016 Sort category as I deemed appropriate to create consistency in the database. For example, in the collection some postcards were originally sorted as “correspondence” while others were sorted as “books and pamphlets;” sort categories were updated so that all postcard entries fall into the “correspondence” category. Any artifacts originally categorized as “#N/A,” “TBD,” or “miscellaneous’ were re-sorted to reflect their appropriate category. Following the SOP, items that had no item number and were not found by a keyword search in the spreadsheet were added to a worksheet entitled Not on Inventory – No #. All data fields were filled in except the item number and original sort columns. In total, there are thirty of these items.

During the inventory process I selected potential artifacts for the exhibits and copied and pasted them into a new Excel worksheet on the master inventory workbook. Initially I intended to select a representative sample from each of the categories to reflect the diversity of the collection; however, due to the size limitations for exhibits on the Google Arts and Culture forum, the broad scope of the collection, and the vast catalog of literature and projects about rationing, war bonds, poster campaigns, and other topics present in the Von der Porten Collection, I elected to narrow my focus to objects that would primarily be found inside the home and would best answer my research question. Due to not personally inventorying the first fifty boxes, I used descriptions from the Excel spreadsheet and the photographs provided by the Von der Portens to select items from those boxes. The original VdP photographs were organized by both VdP item number and VdP category, making this process relatively easy. Inventory was completed in May 2017 at the end of my spring internship with the NPS. At completion, there were approximately seventy-five items unaccounted for, which I highlighted in yellow on the spreadsheet. I attribute this to human error during the inventory process, as many objects were later found during the cataloging and rehousing process in boxes inventoried by previous interns and myself. Those objects were not re-sorted and retain their original sort category, even if they are “#N/A,” “TBD,” or “miscellaneous.” As of now, out of the 1,887 objects in the collection, forty-five are unaccounted for and there are three—highlighted in blue with detailed notes—that are likely inventory mistakes, for a total of 1,839 objects present and accounted for (Table 2; Appendix C).

Photographing, Cataloging and Rehousing

In August 2017 I began the process of photographing, cataloging, and rehousing the objects for the exhibits. I used a Canon DSLR camera provided by the NPS for photographing the objects. As mentioned previously, the Von der Portens had provided photographs for all of the items; however, they were not exhibit quality so could not be used. Photos were edited using the photo editor from Windows 10, and edits were restricted to cropping, straightening, and brightening. Finished photos were saved to the appropriate NPS network drive for permanent storage.

Table 2. Von der Porten Collection Category Totals

Sort Category	Number of Cataloged Items	Percent of Total

In order to be exhibited, all objects must be cataloged in the NPS database. The NPS uses a proprietary museum management program, Interior Collections Management System (ICMS), to manage their cultural resources, and follows the Chenhall system for classifying objects, Nomenclature 3.0 for Museum Cataloging Third Edition of Robert G. Chenhall's System for Classifying Man-made Objects (Bourcier, Rogers, and Committee 2010). During cataloging original VdP item numbers were replaced by NPS catalog numbers specific to the Rosie the Riveter site (e.g. RORI 0000) and an additional column, NPS Catalog #, was added to the working VdP spreadsheet. Some items that consisted of multiple parts but were listed as a single item in the original inventory list were cataloged separately, such as the embroidered dish towels (RORI 4275-4281) and set of drinking glasses (RORI 4271-4274). Between September 2017 and June 2018, I cataloged 233 objects, 100 of which make up the exhibits. Because the original VdP boxes were not museum quality, all cataloged objects were rehoused using acid-free archival materials. Additionally, all objects that shared a box with a cataloged object or objects were also rehoused, even if they were not cataloged, for a total of 686 rehoused objects in thirty-eight archival boxes. Per NPS direction, rehoused boxes retained their original VdP box number. During this process some box numbers were eliminated, so I created a document to track them and to keep notes on which boxes had room for more items.

Oral Histories

Oral histories were collected from the Rosie the Riveter Trust and the Bancroft Library Oral History Center online databases. I downloaded twenty oral history transcripts from these sites using key words to search for histories—patriot, gender, women, home, house, kid, children, wife, toy, game—and again to search within the transcripts themselves. Histories were chosen when the context of search terms resulted in a narrative that I thought would inform my project. This was a rather time-consuming process, as the Bancroft Library Oral History Center's search feature is rather limited. The Rosie Trust's search feature is also rather limited and does not allow for the search of key words; however, they have the transcripts sorted in alphabetical order by last name with a photo of the narrator and a content abstract, making this forum easier to navigate. I primarily chose histories from women; men's histories were selected only if they were children during the war. My goal was to find common themes of experience such as patriotism, childhood memories and impressions of the war, and discussions of gender roles.

In addition to already recorded histories, I conducted two personal interviews with Ed Von der Porten in December 2017 and February 2018. We discussed the collection at length and his own recollections about the war, as he was a young boy during that time and was able to share his memories and how they related to some of the objects in the collection. These interviews provided historical background and context for the collection and assisted me in making decisions about exhibit content. A few of the models were built by him prior to being donated and I included two of them to honor him after his passing in April 2018.

The Exhibits

Google Arts and Culture was suggested by the NPS as an online forum for the exhibits. It is a free online platform that allows individuals and organizations to showcase a variety of cultural resources. This forum was chosen over the official NPS Rosie the Riveter web catalog due to ease of use and its use by the NPS for exhibiting collections from many of their parks. Virginia Bones, NPS Museum Technician, has used this forum in the past and assisted me in preparing and executing the exhibits. First, a metadata spreadsheet was created using the Google Arts and Culture content requirements. Information for each exhibit object was entered including title, description, NPS catalog number, keywords, material, measurements, and time period, among others. Initially, my project deliverable was going to be a single exhibit containing approximately 90 objects; however, per Virginia Bones, Google Arts and Culture restricts exhibits to 35-40 items per exhibit, so I opted to create two separate but related exhibits, one focusing on material culture specific to women and the general household, the other on children.

Seventeen of the objects chosen for exhibit are copyrighted and therefore required me to obtain or attempt to obtain copyright permission from the publisher. For some objects this was simple and consisted of contacting the publisher and submitting an electronic copyright permission request form; for others the publisher either no longer exists and has no successor, making obtaining permission impossible, or, in the case of six objects copyrighted by Whitman Publishing (RORI 4180-4183, RORI 4213, RORI 4219), the successor(s)—Western Publishing and Bedford/St. Martin's—did not know which of their affiliated companies had jurisdiction over them. Per NPS direction, I kept electronic and paper copies of all my research and communications as a record of due diligence. Given that these objects were all copyrighted in the 1940s and I am neither reprinting nor distributing them in any way it is unlikely there will be any issues.

Exhibit 1: Patriotism, Women, & Domesticity

The focus of this exhibit was on objects that would be found in the home, such as practical use items, home décor, books, military souvenirs, and personal adornment. Because women were the primary targets of propaganda campaigns, objects that reflected those campaigns were easily visible in a variety of categories in the Von der Porten Collection. The exhibit features thirty-five exhibit items containing fifty-two cataloged objects from six of the sixteen original sort categories (Table 3). I chose to photograph some objects together to better utilize my limited space, and because for some objects, such as the embroidered dish towels (RORI 4275-4281), exhibiting them as a set made more sense. As I wanted the focus of this exhibit to be on things that primarily would be visible in one’s home, most objects are from the “household and decorative” category.

Table 3. Patriotism, Women, & Domesticity Category Totals

Sort Category	Number of Cataloged Items	Percent of Total
Books and pamphlets	11	21.2%
Correspondence	3	5.8%
Household and decorative	30	57.7%
Lapel pins and accessories	2	3.8%
Sheet music	1	1.9%
Souvenirs from military	5	9.6%

Exhibit objects were divided into five themed sections: 1) In the Home, 2) Souvenirs, 3) Books, 4) The Kitchen, and 5) Patriotic Beauty. Text was written for each section panel, in addition to individual exhibit labels for most of the objects. The sections are representative of museum exhibits that utilize rooms or exhibit cases to differentiate between themes. I elected to group together items that either fell in to the same category such as books and pamphlets, or that would be found in the same room of a home, such as the salt and pepper shakers (RORI 4171, RORI 4217) and drinking glasses (RORI 4271-4274). I wanted the exhibit narrative to flow like a tour through an actual home.

Exhibit 2: The Playroom

For this exhibit I chose a selection of objects that reflected the patriotic themes of the era, were both gender specific or gender neutral, and represented a range of socio-economic availability. The exhibit features thirty-five exhibit items containing forty-eight cataloged objects from five of the sixteen original sort categories (Table 4). As with the Patriotism, Women, & Domesticity exhibit, some objects were photographed together for space and narrative reasons. Toys make up the highest percentage of objects in this exhibit due to their significance to children and the large amount of them present in the Von der Porten Collection.

Table 4. The Playroom Category Totals

Sort Category	Number of Cataloged Items	Percent of Total
Books and pamphlets	2	4.2%
Children’s games	4	8.3%
Models and kits	5	10.4%
Puzzles	1	2.1%
Toys	36	75%

Like I did with the Patriotism, Women, & Domesticity exhibit, I divided the objects up into six themed sections representing the different types of objects: 1) War Play, 2) Wooden Toys, 3) Games, 4) Reading, Learning, Creating, 5) Dolls & Dress-Up, and 6) Models. Each section showcases how toy and game manufacturers capitalized on material shortages and the collective patriotism of the era.

4. DISCUSSION

The material culture from WWII provides insight into the individual and collective lives and identities of Americans on the home front. Patriotism and visible support for the war effort was expected of all Americans, but even more so from women. Due to their longstanding cultural position as the primary consumers and moral guides of their household, women were obliged to support the war effort in every aspect of their lives, through domestic practices, femininity and beauty, and as mothers raising young patriots, all of which were directly linked to the choices they made as consumers. Like their mothers, those young patriots were inundated with images of war and messages about patriotism and victory. For them, toys were the most visible method of delivery for those messages, and toy manufacturers capitalized on the war by creating toys that kept the war at the forefront of their lives while remaining affordable for even the most frugal consumers. In this chapter I examine how the objects selected from the Von der Porten Collection for my exhibits reflect those themes, highlighting a few of the objects from each section of the exhibits.

Exhibit 1: *Patriotism, Women, & Domesticity

As discussed in the previous chapter, my goal for this exhibit was to create a narrative that took the viewer on a tour through a typical WWII-era home, with an emphasis on the role of women. Although every American was expected to participate in the war effort, the role of women on the American home front during WWII was key to its success. Without the participation of women in industry, in military service, and at home, the war likely would have had a different outcome for the United States. Aside from whatever other roles they may have had outside the home, inside the home is the primary place where women supported both the war effort and the economy. As homemakers and as the principal consumers for their household, women were responsible for purchasing virtually everything for their homes, and, as such, were able to assert their individual and collective identities through material goods.

In the Home

People communicated their patriotism by displaying and using items that signified support for and engagement in the war, and their homes reflected the nation's involvement in the war as well as their own individual tastes. The level of connection a family or an individual had to the war varied considerably, and that level could be indicated by material culture. Items like the V-Mail Sheets or Service Flag (Appendix A) would only be present in a home with a family member serving overseas, whereas a common practical use item like the 1942 Wall Calendar (Figure 1) could be found in any home. The calendar, with its youthful theme, emphasizes America's children as a driving force for adhering to the government's wartime policies. It is a subtle, yet powerful and persuasive image—if the war is not won, what will the future hold for our innocent children?

Several of the objects in this section reflect how victory was attainable through supporting the government and the military, such as the Keep 'Em Flying Paperweight (Appendix A) and the “Victory Swatter” Fly Swatter (Figure 2). When new, this victory-themed fly swatter featured a patriotic red, white, and blue wooden handle and a clear message about who the enemy was. As a result of the attack on Pearl Harbor, the Japanese took center stage as America's enemy, and anti-Japanese sentiment surged, ultimately resulting in the imprisonment of 120,000 Japanese Americans by the government from 1942-1946. The swatter proclaims, “This Victory Swatter can't be used to battle the Japs, but the steel saved in the wire handle can.” Racist language like that on this fly swatter emphasizes how victory could be achieved by adhering to government policies, and is also an important reminder of the dehumanizing elements of war.

Souvenirs

This section of the exhibit uses military souvenirs to emphasize the theme of victory as a worthy and attainable goal by the armed forces. Almost all of the souvenirs in the Von der Porten Collection are military related: pillowcases, handkerchiefs, magazines, war maps, flags, foreign currency, and other memorabilia make up the 135 objects in the souvenirs category. Men serving overseas commonly sent souvenirs to their loved ones for them to proudly display in their homes as symbols of patriotism and support. Additionally, veterans often returned home with items they had acquired during their service. “Send home” items like the U.S.S. Curtis Pillowcase (Appendix A), which proclaims the U.S. Navy as “America’s Guardian,” stresses the importance of supporting the war effort in order for the Navy to perform its duty and protect America. Similarly, the Nazi NFSK Dagger (Figure 2) accentuates America’s role as the “good guys” in the global conflict. Possession of this dagger by an American would signify victory over the enemy and displaying this combat souvenir would broadcast one’s personal participation in the war and their identity as a proud and victorious hero and patriot.

Books

Books provide an excellent snapshot of an era's events and cultural values. The books included in this section reflect how the themes of victory and patriotism were embedded into the practices of everyday life, and highlight how women were expected to participate in the war effort through daily domestic activities such as food preparation and rationing, saving energy, and music. Even the most mundane domestic tasks like knitting (Figure 4) became a patriotic duty for the women of America. Knitting, a common domestic hobby, provided much needed items for soldiers overseas and, perhaps more importantly, provided the women who knitted them with a feeling of contributing to the fight for victory in a meaningful way.

Arguably, books were critical for putting government propaganda into action. Of the 151 books and pamphlets in the Von der Porten Collection, fifteen are related to food: rationing, recipes, preserving and canning, and planting Victory Gardens. The government stressed the importance of food conservation and adhering to rations, urging citizens to "Produce and Conserve, Share and Play Square," touting food as the mightiest weapon a woman could wield from her home (Adkins et al. 1994). During WWII, staying healthy was heralded as a patriotic duty, and numerous books were published to assist homemakers with ways to maintain health while being as thrifty as possible. Some, like the Health-For-Victory Club Meal Planning Guide (Figure 5), were published as regular periodicals. The Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company partnered with the Home Economics Institute of America to publish these monthly booklets that, in addition to meal and nutrition guides, were loaded with advertisements—propaganda—that encouraged buying war bonds and stressed the importance of supporting the war effort in every way possible. This particular publication encouraged “club member” participation by publishing question and answer sections and other interactive features, reinforcing the idea of community and the importance of being actively involved in this critical element of the war effort.

expectations of traditional femininity. For this section I selected objects that reflected those themes in a variety of ways. One of the most vivid representations of what was expected of women during WWII are the Day of the Week Embroidered Dish Towels (Figure 6). These hand

The Kitchen

The kitchen has long been considered the heart of the home (Anderson 1981; Hartmann 1984; Rotman 2009; Yang 2005). It is where meals were prepared and shared, and where women were expected to spend a significant amount of time to care for their families. Often called “kitchen patriots” (Yang 2005), women played a crucial role in supporting the war effort from their kitchens, essentially becoming domestic soldiers in a home front army, all while adhering to the cultural embroidered dish towels feature a female soldier performing daily household tasks like shopping, ironing, washing, mending, cleaning, and cooking. The soldier appears to be completing her duties with vigor and determination, just like every domestic soldier in the home front army should.

Keeping the war at the forefront of everyday life was essential to maintaining its support on the home front. After the U.S. joined WWII, virtually everything got a war-themed makeover, and this is evident in the Von der Porten Collection. Items like the Novelty Salt and Pepper Shaker Sets (Figure 7) were a simple yet effective way to ensure that the war remained centered in the routine tasks of daily life such as cooking and sharing meals. As a way to boost sales in a wartime economy, manufacturers of practical use items like the wooden War-time Bottle Opener

(Figure 8) cashed in on material shortages by creating items that emphasized rationing and denoted eager participation in the war effort. Companies understood that by marketing “war-friendly” products they could ensure sales of their products in an otherwise thrifty wartime economy. For consumers, having items like this in one’s home signified cooperation and participation in the government’s policies, and may have even provided them with a sense of contributing to the war effort.

Patriotic Beauty

The expectations placed on women during WWII to be enthusiastic domestic soldiers also included their appearance. As discussed previously, to counter the perceived “masculinization” of women caused by their new roles in industry and military service, an emphasis was placed on traditional femininity and beauty standards, particularly for middle-class white women. Women were expected to support their men while emphasizing their femininity and living up to the cultural ideal of the all-American woman. In this way, embodying that ideal became a patriotic duty and women could assert their feminine identity and their support for the war through routine beauty and hygiene practices, and personal adornment items like Victory Scarves, handkerchiefs, and soap (Appendix A). The objects in this section showcase how every aspect of women’s lives were affected by the war.

The “ideal wartime woman” was expected to be beautiful, patient, cheerful, and faithful (McEuen 2011, 4). Her primary role—her primary identity—was supporter: support the war effort, support her children, support her husband, and support the men overseas who were doing the “real” fighting. One way that a woman could signal both her support for the war and her enlisted man was through sweetheart jewelry (Figure 9). Popular since WWI, sweetheart jewelry surged in production and availability during WWII (Golden 2014). Jewelry like this allowed women to advertise a connection to a man serving overseas, and also provided comfort to men, as their fears about long distance romances would be assuaged by knowing their beautiful and faithful sweetheart was proudly displaying her status as a “taken woman.” In this way, a woman’s identity as supporter was reinforced, and she maintained the traditional ideal of supportive, submissive housewife. This particular bracelet, made of inexpensive and non-rationed plastic, also appealed to consumers who wished to save money and precious materials like metal.

Materials rationing impacted almost every aspect of daily life, including fashion and beauty. Nylon was needed for parachutes, so the production of hosiery stopped, resulting in bare legs and a new market for leg makeup (McEuen 2011; Witkowski 1998). Bare legs coupled with shorter skirts drew attention to female sexuality and factored into the expansion of pin-up culture, both abroad and on the home front (McEuen 2011). The rationing of metal used to make hairpins made saving and reusing them a priority (Figure 10). Package inserts encouraged women to carry their pins with them to their hair appointments, and portable plastic “Victory Purse Packs” enabled women to easily transport their precious metal hairpins in their purses, reducing the need to constantly purchase new ones. These pins are an excellent example of how manufacturers capitalized on white middle-class beauty ideals, frugal consumers, and patriotism.

Exhibit 2: *The Playroom

For this exhibit I elected to group the objects into categories by type to demonstrate how manufacturers of children's toys and games offered a variety of war-themed merchandise that was accessible to everyone, regardless of socio-economic class or gender. The experience of WWII for American children varied, and was determined by a number of factors such as age, race, ethnicity, socio-economic class, and personal connection to the war (Tong 2014; Tuttle 1995). Play is how children communicate about and cope with their environment, and is essential for teaching young people how to navigate social interactions and interpersonal relationships (Best 1998; Csikszentmihalyi and Bennett 1971; Higonnet 2007; Ossian 2011). War-themed toys, games, puzzles, books, and dolls allowed children to use their imaginations and create narratives about the war that were meaningful and permitted them access to something that was largely reserved for adults.

War Play

This section contains toys that are either general war-themed toys and did not fit into one of the other categories, or were pre-war. Though the focus of this exhibit is primarily 1941-1945, the time in which the U.S. was actively involved in the war, I thought it was important to highlight how from the late 1930s until the bombing of Pearl Harbor, with war already raging in Europe and the topic of the nation's security and defense becoming more prevalent in national discourse, toy and game manufacturers began introducing more war-themed toys into the market, promoting them as "defense items" rather than "war toys" (Matthews 2006, 12). Pre-war toys like the Buddy Helmet, Marx Tinsplate Tank, the Par-A-Chute Toy, and the Fleron Official Signaler (Appendix B) all highlight how images of war were already permeating children's consciousness prior to December 7, 1941.

Perhaps the most obvious toys for war play are toy soldiers (Figure 11). Toy soldiers have a long history throughout the world, dating back to ancient Egypt (“A Brief History of Toy Soldiers” n.d.). Prior to WWII, the majority of toy soldiers were made of metal; however, due to materials rationing, plastic and composition soldiers gained popularity. Toy soldiers and their accessories allowed children to play at war while remaining free from its often devastating consequences. I created this display—consisting of nine separately cataloged objects—because I wanted to illustrate how toy soldiers and their accessories provided children with an outlet for their imaginations, and the display is more effective at conveying that than one or two toy soldiers on their own without any context.

Wooden Toys

Wooden toys increased in production during WWII as a result of material shortages. The Von der Porten Collection features over 100 wooden toys representing a wide variety of style and economic range, from more expensive toys made by well-known toy manufacturers like Holgate and Keystone, to the more affordable "shop toys" created in garages and home workshops. In this section I attempted to accent that assortment and demonstrate the broad availability of war-themed wooden toys (Appendix B). The Holgate Army Truck (Figure 12) is an excellent representation of a high-end toy aimed at less frugal consumers, and also ties into the previous section's pre-war theme. Originally a manufacturer of industrial and domestic wood products, Holgate began making educational toys in 1929 ("Holgate Toy History" n.d.). In the latter half of 1941, prior to the bombing of Pearl Harbor, they featured this truck in their catalog along with several other vehicles modeled after the U.S. Army, and touted the vehicles as "Toys of Today" (Guenthner 2008). At $1.25, the truck was relatively expensive for its time, making it unrealistic for middle- and working-class families. In 1942, the average monthly salary for a manufacturing job was $150, equivalent to $2,400 today, and that toy—equivalent to $20

today—would not have fit in the budget (“CPI Inflation Calculator” 2018). Nor would it have been easily attainable for the average child on his or her own whose allowance was typically twenty cents per week, half of which went to buying savings stamps for the war (Von der Porten 2017, 2018).

A lot of wooden toys were available for a lower price. Many manufacturers produced simply made wooden trucks, jeeps, tanks, airplanes, ships, and even toy guns, with minimal silkscreened or rubber-stamped details like stars or something that denoted the U.S. military in some manner. In addition to the larger established manufacturers, there were a number of smaller, locally-owned shops that produced modest quantities and varying qualities of wooden toys, often made in home workshops, as well as people who made toys for their children as a way to save money (Von der Porten 2017). One such item is the Wooden Toy Tank Bank (Figure 13). Crudely made with etched details, this little toy bank is evident of a frugal mindset, both in its function and how it was produced.

Games

Like toys, children's games also received war-themed makeovers. The production of war games peaked during WWII, becoming an effective delivery method for wartime propaganda (Matthews 2006). For many children, the war was exciting and fun, a game to be played and won. War-themed games provided children with an outlet for playing war; it was a great way to pass the time, learn about significant events from the war, and stay engaged while remaining safe from its dangers (Matthews 2006). Games stressed the importance of victory over the enemy, with variations of that theme present in everything from puzzles to board games like checkers (Appendix B). Battle Checkers Beat the Axis was checkers, WWII-edition (Figure 14). The game features WWII battlegrounds and military themed playing pieces, and emphasizes the importance of strategy for victory:

Battle Checkers is a brand new game based on the military maneuvers of attack and defense. It is as easy to play as ordinary checkers . . . exciting and absorbing . . . the game for wide-awake Americans of every age. You needn't be a checker or chess-player or a military strategist to win! But Battle Checkers is purely a game of skill, not chance. Alertness, judgment, ability to outguess and outplay your opponent all pay dividends in Battle Checkers just as they do along the far-flung battle-grounds of World War II.

(“Battle Checkers” n.d.)

By offering itself as a game suitable for all age it also encouraged family engagement: this game could be played as family and would ensure that the war remained at the forefront of leisure time.

Reading, Learning, Creating

War-themed comics, coloring books, and educational items provided a creative outlet for children that also ensured the war remained visible in their day-to-day activities. The items featured in this section show how manufacturers tailored images and symbols of war to suit young minds. An excellent example of this is the comic book, Private Breger: His Adventures in an Army Camp (Figure 15). The author, Dave Breger, was an award-winning cartoonist who created the popular Sunday comics, Private Breger and G.I. Joe. Private Breger was a spoof character based on Breger himself. His comics appealed to children because they were humorous and kept the seriousness of war at bay.

Manufacturers sought to fill every activity of children's lives with war narratives and imagery that was suited to them. The Cartoon Drawing Set and Victory Paint Book (Appendix B) provide a glimpse into how they were able to do that in a variety of ways. Similar to the bumbling Private Breger, the Cartoon Drawing Set features a happy-go-lucky soldier, clearly enjoying his duties. Like the Breger book, this set suggests to children that war is fun—even funny—and teaches them that patriotism is a noble and expected trait for an American. The Victory Paint Book is a coloring book that tells the story of several young boys who enlist in the army and go to boot camp, and the girls who stay home, become nurses, and write them letters. This narrative reflects the lighthearted nature of most of the material culture produced for children during the era, and also reinforces the traditional gender roles that young boys and girls were expected to embody as adults, as well as the importance of patriotism and national loyalty.

Dolls & Dress-Up

While the majority of war toys were primarily marketed to boys—war is men's work, after all—many were tailored to girls or designed to appeal to both. The items in this section highlight how clothes, dolls, and figures sought to include all children, regardless of gender, in the war effort, while still reinforcing the traditional gender roles they were expected to fulfill. Playing with dolls and dressing up in Victory Suits (Appendix B) enabled children to use their imaginations and engage in the war in a way that was meaningful to them.

My favorite entry in this section is the Sculpture-ettes paper doll kit (Figure 16). This paper doll kit features patterns for four female figures—WAVES, farmerette, WAAC, nurse—and five male figures—aviator, mechanic, marine, sailor, and soldier. With men off to war, women were expected to fill positions that challenged traditional gender roles, albeit temporarily. This kit reflects those changes and celebrates women in a variety of positions, some of which were new to them and normally reserved for men like the WAVES (Women Accepted for Voluntary Emergency Service, a unit of the U.S. Naval Reserve) and WAAC (Women's Auxiliary Army Corp). Though these changes were intended to be temporary, with women resuming their positions as housewives and mothers once the war was over, many young girls viewed the new opportunities afforded to women as something to aspire to. However, in reality this kit is essentially a propaganda machine: it highlights the role of “supporter” that women were expected to play during the war while simultaneously emphasizing their femininity. The manufacturer called this the “All Out America Set,” and the fact that five of the nine dolls are male figures underscores the value placed on men in society compared to women.

Models

Model-making has long been a popular hobby in the U.S. During WWII, model manufacturers cashed in on the war by creating model kits that reflected the public's interest in Jeeps, military planes, and Navy ships, amounting to a $25 million a year business (Ossian 2011). The Von der Porten Collection contains over 350 models and model kits encompassing the full range of ability and cost. The models featured in this section demonstrate how manufacturers tailored their kits to material shortages and interest in the military. Model kits were available in a wide range of skill level and price points, making them accessible to everyone, regardless of ability or socio-economic status. Many manufacturers made “dime kits” so a child with a twenty cent allowance—after using ten cents to buy their war savings stamp—would have enough left over to purchase a kit (Von der Porten 2017). These kits were usually made of cardboard, paper, or balsa wood, and were relatively basic and easy to put together.

Some models that cost a little more—twenty-five cents—were a bit sturdier and more complex, like the West-Craft Jeep Model (Figure 17). This punch-out cardboard model features wooden wheels and a fold-down windshield, and required its builder to borrow straight pins from their mother for the dashboard and shifter details (Von der Porten 2017). I selected this model for the exhibit for two reasons: first, this particular model was built by Mr. Ed Von der Porten himself and I thought it fitting to include it as a way to honor him; second, army Jeeps were a relatively new invention during WWII, and their popularity with model makers reflects civilian interest in all things military. The red, white, and blue box also features a vibrant patriotic theme.

Some model manufacturers made educational model kits, like Joe Ott's Identoplanes Model Kit (Figure 18). This kit contains six die-cut sheets for making twenty-four different Allied and Axis military airplanes, and was designed to be both fun and educational. Building the models in this kit was a great way for children and adults alike to pass the time and stay engaged with civil defense efforts by being able to identify "the enemy," should that need arise. Civil defense was an important part of the American home front during WWII. In 1941 President Roosevelt established the Office of Civilian Defense whose goal was to mobilize civilians to prepare for defending the country from various threats to the home front (Kerr 1983). Possessing items that supported those efforts was another visible way to demonstrate support for and engagement in the war, and for children, items like this model kit kept the war “fun” and reiterated the importance of victory over the enemy.

Conclusion

Material culture reflects the society in which it is produced. It provides a way for those producing and using it to express the cultural values and beliefs that define the time period, as well as express their individual and collective identities. During WWII, certain values were assigned meaning by the U.S. government—patriotism, victory, loyalty, sacrifice—and were visible in virtually every category of material culture. For women and children not actively participating in the war effort as workers or in military service, purchasing and using the items that embodied those values provided a means to visibly demonstrate their allegiance to the country and support for the war effort.

Gender roles underwent significant upheaval during the war years, resulting in the hyper-feminization of women as a way to counter their perceived “masculinization” from participation in non-traditional roles. As a result, women were expected to perform their traditional gender roles in ways that were highly visible to promote the ideal image of the white, middle-class, American housewife. One way this was done was through material culture that emphasized patriotism and support for the war effort while also emphasizing femininity and the woman’s proper place in the domestic sphere as wife, mother, and homemaker. For women, material culture was a means to show patriotism, support the war, and assert a traditional feminine identity. Similarly, children used material culture like toys, books, and games to engage in the war in their own way. Government propaganda and images of the war were everywhere: on radio, in comics, and on film, and many children had parents who were active participants, either as workers or in military service. For some children, the war was exciting (Lloyd 2012; Von der Porten 2018), for some it was just a part of life (Powers 2011), and for others it was a source of anxiety (Tong 2014; Tuttle 1995), so engaging with toys and games that let them be the victor provided comfort in a time of uncertainty and turmoil.

The Von der Porten Collection provides a meaningful look into the lives of home front Americans during WWII. Prior to the December 7, 1941 attack on Pearl Harbor, a significant population of Americans wanted no part of the war, embracing an “America First” ideology: the First World War had left a bad taste in the mouths of many Americans and they did not want to participate in another European conflict (Von der Porten 2017). However, after the attack on Pearl Harbor, there was a collective shift in attitude, because now it was no longer abstract; it had become personal. In an instant, “America First” took on new meaning, and patriotism became a way of life for the next almost four years. The importance placed on patriotism by Americans was, for the most part, a collective web of significance they themselves spun (paraphrasing Geertz 1973, 5). In other words, propaganda produced by the U.S. Government to secure participation and cooperation in the war effort was embraced by a significant population of Americans and framed as something they wanted to do; in a sense, removing the government influence and asserting it as an individual choice.

5. CONCLUSION

When I first began this project, I was uncertain how well I would be able to answer my research question, and whether or not I could create something that was meaningful and added to the body of work surrounding this area of inquiry. There is considerable literature on the American experience during WWII, particularly concerning propaganda campaigns, home front efforts, cultural values, and women and gender roles, and a modest amount on the experiences of American children. By studying the literature and poring over the vast catalog of artifacts in the Von der Porten Collection, I endeavored to tell a story of home life on the home front by presenting a visual cultural storybook of how propaganda manifested as patriotism at home through the exhibits I created.

From the start I was aware of some of the limitations of this study. While the Von der Porten Collection provides a comprehensive look at the propaganda, material culture, and cultural values that dominated the American home front during WWII, it offers only a general understanding of how it was experienced by its citizens. Unlike an archaeological site, the artifacts in the collection have no provenience to distinguish the ethnic, racial, or socio-economic identity of their original owners. WWII was not experienced the same way for all Americans. Prior to the war, poor, working-class, black, and other marginalized groups already faced significant discrimination, racism, and restricted access to resources, and the war likely only added to those struggles. Without question, the experience of Japanese Americans during WWII was drastically different than any other group's. For historical archaeologists, understanding how race, ethnicity, and class intersect is vital to making meaningful interpretations, and without any way of pinpointing those intersections the best practitioners can do is provide a broad analysis, which is what I have done here.

So, with no provenience, how representative of American cultural values is this collection and how can that be determined? Undeniably, the artifacts in the Von der Porten Collection, coupled with the literature, demonstrate that war propaganda manifested in virtually every category of material culture; however, how much of that material culture and the messages it conveyed was eagerly consumed by individuals varied and was dependent on a variety of factors, not least of all race, ethnicity, and socio-economic class. Artifacts tell stories, but they must have context. Unfortunately, very few of the objects in the Von der Porten Collection can be traced to specific individuals. I propose that future studies of WWII material culture would yield more focused results by an examination of artifacts that have known provenience.

Patriotism was indeed a value that the U.S. government sought to elicit from Americans during WWII, and that is undeniably visible in the Von der Porten Collection. White, middle-class women and children were the primary targets of propaganda, with much of the imagery used reinforcing white, middle-class cultural values and ideals as something to strive for. Which, ultimately, ignored the experience of other demographics, making it indisputable that patriotism and support for the war effort was not a universal experience for all Americans.

The Von der Porten Collection

All of the objects exhibited here are part of the Ed and Saryl Von der Porten Collection, a collection of over 1,800 WWII-era artifacts that are part of the museum collection at Rosie the Riveter/WWII Home Front National Historical Park in Richmond, CA. The Von der Portens spent several decades building this collection of Home Front memorabilia that includes books, war bond and ration materials, toys, models and model kits, newspapers and magazines, household and decorative items, posters, and military souvenirs. Their passion and appreciation for history and material culture resulted in an incredible collection of artifacts that will remain an important part of the WWII American Home Front legacy.

Home Front Households: Patriotism, Women, & Domesticity

WWII was a time of significant cultural upheaval and change in the United States. America's participation in the war produced substantial transformations to gender roles, consumer behavior, advertising, labor, children's activities, and entertainment. During this time period, cultural ideals about femininity and domestic practices were very specific: a woman's proper place was in the home as housewife, cook, and mother. However, the war created a need for women to step out of their kitchens and into the factories, and propaganda campaigns artfully fostered temporary changes in behavior while simultaneously reinforcing cultural norms, hailing domesticity as a duty as patriotic as picking up a rivet gun. The objects featured in this exhibit showcase how patriotism manifested in the home through material culture, with an emphasis on the role of women as domestic soldiers on the American Home Front.

SECTION PANEL: In the Home

During WWII, every American citizen was expected to participate in Home Front efforts. People communicated their patriotism by displaying items that signified support for and engagement in the war. Their homes reflected both their individual tastes and the United States' involvement in the global conflict. The items in this section showcase a sample of the kinds of objects displayed and used in American homes during WWII.

RORI 4168 Ceramic Tank Decanter

RORI 4175 Blue Star Flag with Golden Eagle

The service flag is the culturally recognized symbol of a loved one in military service. During WWII families signaled their personal participation in the war effort and their allegiance to the U.S. Armed Forces by hanging service flags in windows or inside their homes.

RORI 4139 "Keep 'Em Flying" Paperweight

The "Keep 'Em Flying" slogan was coined by chief army recruiting officer Lt. Col. (later Maj. General) Harold N. Gilbert to elicit support for airmen of the U.S. Army Air Forces during World War II. The Army Air Forces was formed in 1941 from the Army Air Corps and was succeeded by the U.S. Air Force in 1947. "Keep 'Em Flying" is visible on a variety of items from WWII such as matchbooks, pins, signs, and this glass sulfide paperweight.

RORI 4309 1942 Wall Calendar

RORI 4169 & 4226 V-Mail Sheets and Waterman's Ink

V-Mail, also known as Victory Mail, was the method used by the United States during WWII to efficiently send mail to and from those serving in the Armed Forces. Based on the British Airgraph process, letters were copied to microfilm and then reprinted on paper once they reached their destination. V-Mail sheets made the microfilming process easy for the workers who processed them by utilizing standard sizes and layouts. Companies that produced ink, such as Waterman's, began marketing their ink as "ideal for V-Mail" as a way to cash in on the war effort and increase sales.

RORI 4161 F.D.R. "The Man of the Hour" Mantle Clock

Franklin D. Roosevelt (1882-1945) served as president of the United States from 1933-1945, the longest serving president in U.S. history and one of the most popular. Though produced prior to WWII, this clock would have been proudly displayed on household mantles throughout his tenure as president.

RORI 4386-4387 Paper Soldier and Sailor Christmas Ornaments

RORI 4208 Blackout Kit

With the threat of air raids always looming, blackout preparedness was an important part of civilian defense. This kit combined utility with fun, likely as a way to ease the anxiety and fear associated with air raids.

RORI 4174 General MacArthur Piggy Bank

General Douglas MacArthur (1880-1964) was a General of the Army in the U.S. Army, and Field Marshal in the Philippine Army. He retired in 1937 but was recalled to duty in 1941 to assist with the war effort. MacArthur's role as a leader in the Pacific theater during WWII earned him numerous medals, including the Medal of Honor.

RORI 4147 Victory Fly Swatter

When new, this victory-themed swatter featured a patriotic red, white, and blue wooden handle and a clear message about who the enemy was. As a result of the attack on Pearl Harbor, the Japanese took center stage as America's enemy, and anti-Japanese sentiment surged. Racist language like that on this fly swatter reflects that sentiment and is an important reminder of the dehumanizing elements of war.

Text on swatter: "This Victory Swatter can't be used to battle the Japs, but the steel saved in the wire handle can."

SECTION PANELS: Souvenirs

Men serving overseas commonly sent souvenirs to their loved ones for them to proudly display in their homes as symbols of patriotism and support. Additionally, veterans often returned home with items they had acquired during their service. The Von der Porten Collection features 135 souvenir objects that include pillowcases, handkerchiefs, magazines, war maps, flags, foreign currency, and other memorabilia.

RORI 4301 U.S.S. Curtis Pillowcase

The USS Curtis was a U.S. Navy seaplane tender involved in the battle at Pearl Harbor on December 7, 1941. This colorful souvenir pillowcase commemorates the ship and celebrates the U.S. Navy as "America's Guardian."

RORI 4162 USS Boxer Ashtray

Solid aluminum commemorative ashtray modeled after the USS Boxer, a U.S. Navy aircraft carrier built by the Newport News Shipbuilding Company in Newport News, Virginia, made by the ship's builders as a gift for its officers.

RORI 4159 Nazi NSFK Glider Pilot's Dagger

This dagger would have been carried by a member of the NSFK - National Socialist Flyers Corps (Nationalsozialistisches Fliegerkorps) - the predecessor to the Nazi Luftwaffe. Possession of this dagger by an American would signify victory over the enemy and may have even been displayed in the home of a veteran as a souvenir from combat

SECTION PANEL: Books

Books provide an excellent snapshot of an era's events and cultural values. The Von der Porten Collection contains 151 books that capture what life was like during WWII. The books included in this section reflect how the themes of victory and patriotism were embedded into the practices of everyday life, and highlight how women were expected to participate in the war effort through daily household practices such as food rationing, saving energy, and knitting.

RORI 4180-4183 U.S. Army and Navy Guidebooks

RORI 4222 Health-For-Victory Club Meal Planning Guide

Government propaganda campaigns stressed the importance of food conservation, urging citizens to "Produce and Conserve, Share and Play Square," and touting food as "the mightiest weapon of them all!" Women were encouraged to plant Victory Gardens, preserve and dehydrate foods to make them last, adhere to rations, and recycle fats for fuel. During WWII, staying healthy was heralded as a patriotic duty, and numerous books such as this monthly Health-For-Victory Club publication were created to assist homemakers with ways to maintain health while being as thrifty as possible.

RORI 4218 Coupon Cookery by Prudence Penny

Prudence Penny was the pseudonym for a collection of chefs, writers, and editors employed as food columnists by Hearst newspapers across the U.S. in the early to mid-20th century. Prudence Penny's columns featured recipes and advice for preparing delicious and nutritious meals, so it's no surprise that during WWII she would publish a book offering instructions for making the most of rations. This patriotic book features recipes, tips for stretching ration points, and handy charts for exchanging and keeping track of rations.

RORI 4299 Wartime Canning and Cooking Book

RORI 4192 Wartime Ideas for Homemakers Bulletin No. 2

RORI 4191 Knit For Victory Book

Knitting was a common domestic hobby for women, but WWII turned it into an act of patriotism. During the war, patriotic American women knitted countless socks, sweaters, scarves, hats, and other essentials and sent them to men serving in the Armed Forces.

RORI 4219 Book of Civilian Defense

During WWII, the U.S. Government created several councils and organizations that worked together to mobilize civilians to prepare for defending the country from various threats to the home front. This booklet proclaims that civil defense is "The Duty and Destiny of Every American," and provides information on ways to participate in the war effort. Active participation in civil defense was a very visible way of demonstrating one's patriotism and support for the war.

RORI 4300 An Authentic Guide to First Aid and Air Raid Precautions

RORI 4310 Songs of Victory Songbook No.8

Music played an important role during WWII. It provided entertainment and assisted in boosting morale, both abroad and on the Home Front. This patriotic songbook features music and lyrics for 26 songs, including “Uncle Sam I’ll Do my Share,” “Fight, America, Fight,” and “Call to Victory.”

SECTION PANEL: The Kitchen

During WWII, many people considered the kitchen to be the heart of the home. It is where meals were prepared and shared, and where women were expected to spend a significant amount of time to care for their families. Often called “kitchen patriots,” women played an important role in supporting the war effort from their homes and the items in this section are the material symbols of their roles as domestic soldiers on the home front.

RORI 4163 Franklin D. Roosevelt (F.D.R.) Plate by Vernon Kilns

RORI 4271-4274 Set of 4 Sweetheart Drinking Glasses

This set of drinking glasses feature an airman, a naval officer, a sailor, and a laborer with their sweetheart, each with its own patriotic slogan.

The inside view is a bit more risqué and highlights the role that women were expected to fill in supporting their men during the war, and how they were expected to look and dress while doing it.

RORI 4148 OrnaWood Decorative Whisk Broom Holder

This OrnaWood whisk broom holder with a painted military airplane at the top was made to be hung on the wall in the kitchen or utility room. OrnaWood, popular in the mid-twentieth century, is a material made of pressed wood pulp and resin and carved to give the appearance of real wood.

RORI 4158 War-time Bottle Opener

During a time when materials rationing impacted manufacturing, companies sought to market items that emphasized rationing and denoted eager participation in the war effort as a way to boost sales. Having items like this in one's home signified cooperation and participation in the government's policies.

RORI 4178a-b Ceramic Tank Teapot

WWII ended in 1945, allowing much of the world to breathe a collective sigh of relief. This lovely little ceramic teapot symbolizes victory for the Allies after the long and arduous global conflict.

RORI 4275-4281 Day of the Week Embroidered Dish Towel

These hand embroidered dish towels feature a female soldier performing daily household tasks such as ironing, washing, mending, cleaning, and cooking, highlighting the woman's role as a domestic soldier on the home front.

RORI 4217a-b & RORI 4171a-b Novelty Salt and Pepper Shaker Sets

After the U.S. joined WWII, virtually everything got a war-themed makeover. These salt and pepper shaker sets were a simple yet effective way to keep the war effort centered in the routine tasks of everyday life such as cooking and sharing meals.

RORI 4157 Wooden Soldier Napkin Ring

SECTION PANEL: Patriotic Beauty

During WWII, traditional notions about femininity and beauty were accentuated as a way to counter the perceived “masculinization” of women caused by their new roles in industry and military service. Women were expected to support their men while emphasizing their femininity and living up to the cultural ideal of the all-American woman. In this way, embodying that ideal became a patriotic duty and women could assert their feminine identity and their support for the war through routine beauty practices and personal adornment items such as the ones in this section.

RORI 4388-4389 Victory Insignia Scarf by Beau Brummell

U.S. Navy Victory Insignia Scarf with guide for different ways to wear it. This was designed to be sold to servicemen overseas to send home to their sweethearts.

RORI 4154 Vicky Victory Bobbie Pins

The rationing of metal used to make hairpins made saving and reusing them a priority. Package inserts encouraged women to carry their pins with them to their hair appointments, and portable plastic “Victory Purse Packs” enabled women to easily transport their precious metal hair pins in their purses, reducing the need to constantly purchase new ones.

RORI 4177 Navy Sweetheart Bracelet

Sweetheart jewelry surged in popularity during WWII and was a visible way for a woman to assert that she was off-limits, while also signaling her support for the war. Additionally, wearing this was an important means of providing comfort to the men who were serving, as their fears about long distance romances would be assuaged by knowing their sweetheart was proudly displaying her status as a taken woman.

RORI 4164 The Soapy Yanks Boxed Decorative Soaps

Kerk Guild Inc., known for making popular figure soaps like Shirley Temple and the Lone Ranger, cashed in on the war by creating this patriotic set of soaps featuring figures from each branch of the military. While more for decorative purposes than for practical use, they illustrate how every aspect of American lives, including basic daily hygiene practices, were affected by the war.

RORI 4140 Handkerchief

This lovely hand embroidered handkerchief would have been carried by a mother whose son was in the U.S. Navy. This is one of several handkerchiefs from the Von der Porten Collection that designate a woman's connection to either a son or sweetheart in the Armed Forces.

APPENDIX B

Exhibit Text and Photos for Home Front Households: The Playroom

Link to exhibit: <https://artsandculture.google.com/exhibit/rgIS2UtpbBYzLw>

(TITLE PAGE) Home Front Households: The Playroom

The Von der Porten Collection

All of the objects exhibited here are part of the Ed and Saryl Von der Porten Collection, a collection of over 1,800 WWII-era artifacts that are part of the museum collection at Rosie the Riveter/WWII Home Front National Historical Park in Richmond, CA. The Von der Portens spent several decades building this collection of Home Front memorabilia that includes books, war bond and ration materials, toys, models and model kits, newspapers and magazines, household and decorative items, posters, and military souvenirs. Their passion and appreciation for history and material culture resulted in an incredible collection of artifacts that will remain an important part of the WWII American Home Front legacy.

Home Front Households: The Playroom

During WWII, images of war permeated almost every aspect of children's lives, including toys, puzzles, comic books, cartoons, film, and radio. While government propaganda campaigns targeted adults to foster patriotism and elicit support for the war effort, toys and other items ensured the war stayed present in the lives of children. By playing with a toy that reflected the war effort, children participated in something that otherwise would have excluded them, therefore claiming a valid place in the country's collective identity as patriots. The objects featured in this exhibit demonstrate how, during WWII, material culture both fed and satisfied children's fascination with war and a desire to be included.

SECTION PANEL: War Play

During WWII, toys acted as a medium for delivering the patriotic symbols necessary to encourage support for and cultural acceptance of the war. By encouraging children to engage in war play by providing toys for that purpose, it ensured that the narrative of war remained present in their everyday activities. The items exhibited in this section reflect how toy makers marketed a variety of toys for children that fostered active engagement with the war effort.

RORI 4229 Toy "BUDDY" Helmet

RORI 4136 Tinplate Toy Tank by Louis Marx & Co.

Tinplate toys, popular since the mid-19th century, boomed in production and popularity following WWI. After the U.S joined the war in 1941, the manufacture of tinplate toys was temporarily discontinued in order to conserve raw materials, but Marx tinplate toys remained popular through the 1960s. This tank dates to the late 1930s and would have been present in playrooms during WWII.

RORI 4227a-b Par-A-Chute Toy

During WWII, military use of parachutists, known in the military as paratroopers, began on a large scale. Children could make this parachutist fly by blowing air through the bottom of the tube, shooting the figure out of the other end.

RORI 4137 Gung Ho Combat Phone Walkie-Talkie Toy

The walkie-talkie, or two-way radio transceiver, was developed during WWII and greatly assisted the military during the war. As a result, walkie-talkie toys such as this were instantly popular with children and allowed for interactive “war play.”

RORI 4302 Composition Toy Jeep

Due to material shortages, composition became a popular alternative for toy manufacturers during WWII. Made of sawdust and glue, it was cheap and easily molded into virtually any shape.

RORI 4184-4186 Fleron Official Signaler Toy and Continental Code Instruction Booklet

The Boy Scouts used the Fleron Signaler as their official signaler to train boys in Morse Code during the first half of the 20th century. Whether one was a Boy Scout or not, this toy allowed children to learn and play at being a signaler. An advertisement in the February 1940 issue of Boys' Life magazine said, "Every boy wants one. Every boy ought to have one." Sold individually or in sets of two, Fleron Signalers could be hooked up together for sending and receiving messages with friends

RORI 4167 Little Army Doctor Play Set

RORI 4394-4397, 4399-4403 Toy Soldiers

Miniature toy soldiers have a long history throughout the world. Prior to WWII, the majority of toy soldiers were made of metal; however, material shortages during the war restricted the use of metal, and composition soldiers gained popularity. Toy soldiers and their accessories allowed children to “play war” like their daddies and always be the victorious hero without the burden of its ugly realities.

SECTION PANEL: Wooden Toys

Wooden toys increased in production during WWII as a result of material shortages. The collection of wooden toys in this section highlight the variety of style and economic range of wooden toys available, from those made by well-known toy manufacturers like Holgate and Keystone, to "shop toys" created in garages and home workshops.

RORI 4172 Wood Toy Army Truck

RORI 4153 Commando Invasion Barge

When new, this wheeled wooden "rugrat toy" included a small wooden tank that fit in the barge and rolled out of the hinged door. Manufactured in 1943, this toy capitalized on children's' desires to be involved in the war effort.

RORI 4393 Keystone Cannon

Keystone, known for their pressed steel trucks, adapted to the metal shortages during WWII by producing wooden toys instead. This cannon features a spring mechanism for firing Keystone brand projectiles.

RORI 4392a-o Holgate Wooden Army Truck with Peg People

Holgate has been in business since 1789. Originally a manufacturer of industrial and domestic wood products, they began making toys in 1929. Many of their toys, such as this truck, include peg people that can be interchanged with other Holgate toys. Holgate featured this Army Truck in its 1941 catalog, along with several other vehicles modeled after the U.S. Army, and touted the vehicles as “Toys of Today.”

RORI 4230 Wood Toy Tank

Tank toys surged in popularity during WWII as a result of their visibility as a military machine. Though tanks were used in WWI, use was not universal and tank technology was not well-developed until WWII. Toys like this durable wooden pull-toy tank with moveable tracks reflected a growing interest in tanks by children.

RORI 4166 Paratrooper Pistol

This simple wooden toy gun with a colorful adhesive label is an excellent example of a toy manufacturer cashing in on material shortages, frugal consumers, and children's desires for toys that reflected the war.

RORI 4152 Wood Tank Piggy Bank

During WWII, people often made their own toys as a way to save money. This homemade wooden tank piggy bank features a removable artillery gun with a coin slot on top.

RORI 4145 Midgies Mobile Army

Miniature wood and cardboard army play set by Jaymar Specialty Company with four tents, four Jeeps, an airplane, a tank, and two paper American flags. Known for their wooden-jointed character toys, Jaymar began making war-themed toys after the U.S. joined the war.

SECTION PANEL: Games

Like toys, children's games also received war-themed makeovers. Games were a great way for children to pass the time, learn about significant events from the war, and stay engaged while remaining safe from its dangers. The items in this section are just a few of the sixty children's games from the Von der Porten Collection.

RORI 4176 At Ease Game

At Ease card game for "A POCKET FULL OF FUN ANYTIME ANYWHERE * 35 GAMES AND STUNTS." Box contains twenty-four game cards with thirty-five activities and games plus one answer card.

RORI 4155 Atomic Bomb Game

This classic cardboard and glass ball-in-the-hole game sent a clear message about who America's enemy was and emphasized the theme of victory.

RORI 4250 Battle Checkers

Even classic games like checkers got a war makeover. Playing this game, which features WWII battlegrounds and military themed playing pieces, kept the war present during leisure time and reinforced the notion of victory over the enemy.

RORI 4144 Fighters For Victory Jigsaw Puzzle

Cardboard jigsaw puzzles surged in popularity during WWII, as they were inexpensive and the materials used to make them were not among those rationed. Battle scenes, military images, and patriotic themes became the norm for puzzles during WWII, encouraging engagement with the war.

SECTION PANEL: Reading, Learning, Creating

War-themed cartoons, coloring books, and educational items provided a creative outlet for children that also ensured the war remained visible in their day-to-day activities. The items featured in this section show how manufacturers tailored images and symbols from WWII to suit young minds.

RORI 4160 Cartoon Drawing Set

RORI 4141 Private Breger: His Adventures in an Army Camp by Sgt. Dave Breger

Dave Breger (Irving David Breger 1908-1970) was an award-winning cartoonist who created the popular Sunday comics, Private Breger and G.I. Joe. Private Breger was a spoof character based on Breger himself. His cartoons appealed to children and adults alike, as they provided some lighthearted comic relief to the serious topic of war and being a soldier.

RORI 4228 Wonder Bread Insignia Guide

Promotional products such as this were an effective way for companies to advertise both their products and their support for the war effort. This insignia guide, included with the purchase of a loaf of Wonder Bread, was designed to teach young people about military insignia.

RORI 4213 Victory Paint Book

The victory theme was visible in almost every category of children's books, toys, and games during WWII. This coloring book originally belonged to girl named Elizabeth who colored some of the pictures and signed her name on each one

RORI 4156 Military Airplane Collector Cards by Peco

Candy cigarettes were introduced in the early 20th century and remained popular throughout. Though Peco made these collector cards prior to U.S. involvement in the war, 1940-1941, they highlight an interest in military planes by children as a result of the global conflict. These two cards are part of a set of twenty-eight cards that could be collected from packages of Peco Candy Cigarettes.

SECTION PANEL: Dolls and Dress-Up

Although war toys primarily were marketed to boys, many were tailored to girls or designed to appeal to both. The items in this section highlight how clothes, dolls, and figures sought to include all children, regardless of gender, in the war effort.

RORI 4209, 4210, 4211 Sculpture-ettes Paper Doll Kit with built reproductions

This paper doll kit features patterns for four female and five male figures. With men off to war, women were expected to fill positions that challenged traditional gender roles. This paper doll kit reflects some of those changes and celebrates women in a variety of jobs, some of which were normally reserved for men. Though these changes were intended to be temporary, with women resuming their positions as housewives and mothers once the war was over, many young girls viewed these new opportunities afforded to women as something to aspire to. Mr. Ed Von der Porten, the original owner of this collection, created the reproduction WAVES (Women Accepted for Volunteer Emergency Service) and Nurse dolls. WAVES served as a unit of the U.S. Naval Reserve.

RORI 4194a-b Dollywood Defense Doll with Stand

Dollywood Defense Dolls are credited to makeup artist Betty Westmore, who reportedly donated sale profits to war relief funds. Later rebranded as "Dolls of the Allies," this cute wood and cloth soldier doll appealed to boys and girls alike.

RORI 4179 Victory Suit

RORI 4143a-b General MacArthur Doll with Stand

General Douglas MacArthur (1880-1964) was a larger-than-life figure during WWII. Admired by children and adults alike, this doll appealed to people of all ages.

RORI 4190 Our Nurse Nancy Paper Doll

RORI 4165 Soldier Night Light

Without question, soldiers were highly visible, especially as role models for young children. This little ceramic night light features a soldier standing guard. Simple items such as this gave children an extra sense of security when they went to sleep at night.

SECTION PANEL: Models

Model-making has long been a popular hobby in U.S. During WWII, model manufacturers cashed in on the war by creating model kits that reflected the public's interest in Jeeps, military planes, and Navy ships. Models kits were available in a wide range of skill level and price points, making them accessible to everyone. The Von der Porten Collection contains over 350 models and model kits encompassing the full range of ability and cost. The models featured here demonstrate how manufacturers tailored their kits to material shortages and interest in the military.

RORI 4146 Punch Out Model Rigby Destroyer

Wallis Rigby's punch-out paper models with his signature tab-and-slot construction design were popular during WWII due to their affordability and realistic-looking details.

RORI 4390-4391 West-Craft Jeep Model and Box

The Army Jeep was first manufactured in November 1940, and the sturdy four-wheel drive vehicle quickly became an essential tool for the U.S. Army and popular with model makers. This cardboard model features a fold-down windshield and required its builder to borrow straight pins from their mother for the dashboard and shifter details. Mr. Ed Von der Porten, the original owner of this collection, built this particular model.

RORI 4187 ShipShape Destroyer Model Kit

RORI 4170 Identoplanes

Joe Ott is well-known for the model kits he produced in the 1930s and 1940s. This kit, designed to be fun and educational, contains six die-cut sheets for making twenty-four different Allied and Axis military airplanes. Building the models in this kit was a great way for children and adults alike to pass the time and stay engaged with the war effort.
