Marketing is a set of processes for creating, communicating, delivering, and exchanging offerings (including products, services, ideas, and experiences) that have value for consumers, the firm and its stakeholders. The marketing concentration at SJSU focuses on how firms plan, implement and monitor the marketing activities directly related to the process of delivering values to consumers while achieving their profitability goal. The marketing courses are designed to help students understand how specific subareas within marketing, such as consumer behavior, marketing research, promotions, business logistics, supply chain management, retailing, and new product development, contribute to the successful creation of value for consumers and profits for firms. Forward thinking subareas are also emphasized in the marketing concentration, including marketing new technology and social media marketing.

"The marketing curriculum at SJSU is truly one of a kind. There are numerous professors with real-world experience in both the Silicon Valley and around the world. I feel that with this amount of knowledge and learning, SJSU is one of the most cost efficient schools. There are several ways to enhance learning at SJSU, however, my favorite was joining the Marketing Association. As a transfer student, this club was a great way to meet new friends, learn, grow, and network with companies looking for future employees."

—Alex Chao, Senior, Marketing Major

I like the idea of bringing success to a company through the vital role of marketing. My marketing classes have taught me how to make new products or ideas appealing towards a certain market direction. I have been very lucky to have such kind and knowledgeable marketing teachers and classmates throughout my experience at SJSU. I am excited to join the marketing association this semester.
